WASHINGTON - There is a certain consistency to the manner in which your government functions. With one hand it gives (as with the grant an loan programs outlined last week); with the other it takes away. This week's report deals with the latter category.

Under the Energy Conservation and Production Tax Incentives Act, homeowners will receive a modest tax break for installation of certain insulation and other energy-conserving items. A 15 percent credit on up to $2,000 in expenditures (maximum $300 a year credit) can be claimed when such improvements are made to the taxpayer's principal residence. Eligible purchases include replacement burners or furnaces, automatic thermostats, storm windows and doors and electric energy-use display meters.

Solar, wind and geothermal energy equipment qualifies for a tax credit of 30 percent on the first $2,000 and 20 percent on the next $8,000, for a maximum credit of $2,200.

Both the conservation and new equipment credits are effective April 20, 1977 through December 31, 1985, with 1977 and 1978 credits to be taken on 1978 returns. Unused credits may be carried forward two years past the termination date.

Beginning in the 1980 model year, a tax is imposed on automobiles which do not meet mileage standards. These taxes will range from $200 to $550 for 1980 models, and escalate to $500 to $3,850 for 1986 models and beyond. For 1980, automobiles with a rating of at least 15 miles per gallon will not be taxed. The minimum mileage standard will gradually increase to 22.5 miles per gallon by 1986. As with certain other elements in the energy package, there are a number of special rules and exemptions which will apply.

Excise taxes on buses are repealed, effective April 20, 1977 and on bus parts and other related equipment, effective with passage of the bill. A 10 percent investment tax credit is provided for employers who purchase new vans, which seat nine or more, for vanpooling. "Gasahol" is exempted from the 4-cents-a-gallon excise tax when the alcohol is ethanol, produced from grain.

Another tax action, this one concluded in the Revenue Act, repeals the itemized deduction for state and local taxes on motor fuels not used in business activities.

For businesses, series of a new, far-reaching energy-related tax credits will apply over and above any regular investment tax credits.

All told, when you balance the credits and deductions against the penalties and disallowances, the net effect will be to reduce tax revenues by almost $5 billion over the next five years.

The Congress also enacted legislation designed to improve and make more equitable the setting of utility rates by the various states. It was not until the energy crunch hit us that most people became aware that utility rate-setting is a responsibility of the states, not of the federal government, and not simply as the utility desired.

The changes in this area are highly technical, and implementation will bring into more common usage certain phrases which are unfamiliar: time-of-day rates, cost-of-service pricing, interruptible rates, declining block rates, lifeline rates. Opportunities for intervention by consumers and the Department of Energy would be expanded, but final say would be left to the state regulatory agency.

These past two messages represent, in barest outline, the scope of the energy legislation which passed the 95th Congress.

Some of these programs are necessary and long overdue. Some represent new departures in the way we do things in this country. Still others more nearly reflect theory than principle.

Nevertheless, just as records are set to be broken, so too laws are made to be changed. It is a saving grace ofthe democratic process.

Waddell Wins Electric Award

Bobby Waddell, instructor of vocational agriculture at the Appomattox County High School, has been declared the winner of the Public Utilities of Virginias Award for the school year 1977-78. This award recognizes the teacher who conducts the best over-all program in the use and management of electrical energy on the farm.

In declaring the winner, officials of the State Department of Education were most commendable of the work that had been done by Bobby Waddell. He had attended three workshops on electrical management, completed eight quarter hours of credit in courses taught at VPI&SU, and attended a five hour seminar on up-date of agricultural electrical systems. He had spent over 125 hours of actual work experience in personal preparation for teaching electrical management to all day and night classes. Each year for the past four years in teaching vocational agriculture, he has taught units in using electrical energy. One of his innovations in teaching has been to construct teaching aids utilizing power panels to provide students better understanding of electricity. Some of the accomplishments of his students are as follows: thirty-four students have completed an electrical project, fifty-four students repaired electrical appliances and twenty-nine students became involved in a major electrical project such as wiring a garage or out building.

"In a time when the conservation of energy has become a must, teachers of vocational agriculture are trained to provide needed conservation education.

It is most gratifying that Bobby Waddell has set such high standards for the schools in our area." These remarks were made by W. C. Dudley, area supervisor of vocational agriculture for the State of Virginia.

As a winner of the Public Utilities of Virginia Award, Bobby received a check in the amount of $165 plus an engraved certificate.
